

US: ANOTHER CONFIDENCE SURVEY SHOWS CONSUMERS SHRUGGING OFF VOLATILITY

Despite the financial market volatility in early February, the Conference Board consumer confidence index jumped 6.5pts to 130.8 in February, the highest level since November 2000 and within the top 6% of all historical values (Chart 1). Consumers are shrugging off equity market gyrations and higher interest rates and focusing more on tax cuts, the healthy labor market, and rising incomes. The University of Michigan consumer sentiment survey reflected similar views.*

The present situation and expectations subindexes increased, suggesting a robust pace of both current and future private consumption — the primary driver of U.S. economic activity.*

The Conference Board survey showed that consumers remain optimistic about future labor market and business conditions and incomes despite becoming less optimistic about future stock market performance.*

In addition to picking up since late last year, real disposable incomes are getting an additional boost from the Tax Cuts and Jobs Act as firms update withholding schedules to reflect the new legislation. Surprisingly, national reports suggested that a large share of U.S. households were initially not expecting to benefit from the tax cuts, so increased take-home pay likely came as a surprise to many. In addition to the tax cuts, a slew of companies have announced one-time special bonuses, with some increasing minimum wage rates as a response to the new legislation.

Optimism about labor markets has also pushed up confidence. A higher share of consumers viewed jobs as plentiful (up to 39.4% from 37.2%), and fewer viewed jobs as hard to get in February (down to 14.7% from 16.3%), pointing to possible further declines in the unemployment rate in the February employment report (scheduled for release on March 9) (Chart 2).

With the unemployment rate near historical lows, employees have higher bargaining power and firms are offering special bonuses/benefits/higher pay in order to attract or retain qualified workers. Indeed, the highest share of consumers since 2001 expect their incomes to increase in six months (Chart 3). As long as consumers feel confident about future incomes they will continue to spend on discretionary services and big ticket items. Consumers are also optimistic about the broader economy, with more — 25.8% (compared to 21.5% prior) — expecting better future business conditions.

Consumer confidence has been a more reliable predictor of real private consumption since 2016, with households spending more than expected despite very sluggish real disposable income gains (Chart 4). The improved confidence in finances and robust credit growth pushed the personal saving rate all the way down to 2.4% in 2017, near the historical low.

Equity markets may provide less support to consumption this year, but better gains in real disposable incomes and sustained robust labor market growth should ensure a continued robust pace of consumption.
